The content of the courses within my major is valuable.
The instruction in my major field is excellent.

OP 5 CHALLENGE (in order of importance)

Students rated these survey items most important and among the least satisfying from a total of 73 survey items in the study. The five challenges highlighted above call attention to specific areas of registration, instruction, campus climate, and recruitment/financial aid. For more detailed definitions of challenges and strengths, please see page 19.

Students were asked to rate the importance of the following nine factors in their original decision to enroll at their current institution.

Students at four-year public institutions overall, reported they were satisfied with their four-year public institutions

Students at four-year public institutions reported that cost and financial aid were very important factors in their original decision to enroll.

AKEA A

The overall four-year public student satisfaction rate of 53 percent shows that the majority of students are satisfied, but there is still room for improvement. This is also reflected in the retention and graduation rates at many institutions, which also have room for improvement. Four-year public institutions have an opportunity to enhance the perception of academic reputation as a factor in students' enrollment decisions by celebrating and showcasing their instruction-related strengths. At the same time, the data reveal opportunities to increase access to classes and improve student/faculty interaction.

, overall, reported they were satisfied with their online program

For online learners, it is all about convenience and balancing course work with life's other demands. Online program strengths center on support services for the online learners. There is room for improvement on the perceptions of the online academic experience, which is still often compared to the in-classroom experience with which most students are familiar. Institutions have an opportunity to explore different teaching methods that facilitate student and faculty interaction and collaboration.
